

QUARTERLY REVIEW

Emerging Markets Stock Fund

As of September 30, 2019

PORTFOLIO HIGHLIGHTS

The portfolio outperformed the MSCI Emerging Markets Index Net for the three-month period ended September 30, 2019.

Relative performance drivers:

- Stock selection in the information technology (IT) sector was beneficial.
- Our choice of stocks in South Korea added value.
- Security selection in the consumer discretionary sector hampered relative returns.

Additional highlights:

- We retain a growth bias with a diversified portfolio of high-quality, well-run growth companies, emphasizing our highest-conviction ideas. The portfolio is overweight to IT, consumer, and financials stocks, while it is underweight to energy and materials.
- We believe many growth stocks in emerging markets look attractive in terms of free cash flow yields, even though valuation multiples may seem "optically" high. Our research is helping us to find companies that are not dependent on the broader economic backdrop to grow their earnings.

PERFORMANCE REVIEW

Emerging Markets Underperformed On Trade And Global Growth Concerns

Emerging equity markets fell over the quarter in U.S. dollar terms and underperformed the MSCI World Index. Developments over the period included continued fluctuations in investor sentiment over trade relations between the U.S. and China, by far the largest emerging market. The Chinese authorities announced measures aimed at stimulating the slowing domestic economy, including a reduction in the reserve requirement ratio for banks. Broader concerns about the prospects for global growth also weighed on investor confidence.

Other developments included policy easing from the U.S. Federal Reserve; during the period, the U.S. central bank twice reduced interest rates by a quarter point, in July and September. The European Central Bank also announced an easing of monetary policy.

Stock Selection In South Korea Added Value, As Did Our Small Underweight

Investor worries about trade and slower growth saw South Korean equities underperform, although they rallied later in the quarter. Our small underweight here, due to factors such as concerns over some corporate governance practices in this market, added value. However, we have a sizable position in absolute terms. We believe there is some good stock-specific investment potential here, particularly among technology-related companies, and our choice of securities boosted relative returns.

- Our holding in internet firm Naver added value. The company owns the dominant search engine in the country and saw its share price rise sharply on results that showed an acceleration in the growth of its core domestic business. We expect to see continued growth for Naver in its home market on the back of new initiatives in areas such as online video and e-commerce.

Our Choice Of Securities In China Boosted Relative Returns

Chinese equities underperformed as they continued to be buffeted by trade tensions with the U.S. There were also investor concerns about the potential for competitive devaluations, although these later eased. China accounts for the portfolio's largest country position in absolute terms, although we are underweight, largely due to our avoidance of domestic banks. Our positioning here is biased toward companies with exposure to rising disposable incomes, such as select technology and consumer products firms. This approach served us well, contributing to the positive effect of stock selection.

- For example, Sunny Optical Technology, which manufactures optical scientific instruments and lenses for uses including smartphone cameras, strongly outperformed. The shares rallied sharply on positively received results following a period of weakness earlier this year.
- Shares in liquor company Kweichow Moutai continued the strong run of performance they have seen so far this year. Kweichow Moutai is a leading premium white spirit brand in China, and most of its revenues are generated domestically, with a strong position in the high-end segment of the market.

Security Selection In South Africa Weighed On Relative Performance

The "risk off" tone to investment markets saw the rand sell off and the South African market come under pressure. Macroeconomic conditions have generally been tough, and we will be closely monitoring the government's progress on reforms. Our highly detailed research has helped us to identify some well-run companies in this market, although the impact of stock selection was negative over the quarter.

- For example, food retailer Shoprite saw its share price fall sharply on disappointing results. While they showed the company's domestic business starting to recover, its operations in the rest of Africa saw a deterioration in performance due to factors including macroeconomic and currency headwinds.

Stock Selection In The IT Space Had A Significant Positive Impact

IT was the best-performing sector in emerging markets over the quarter, and both our overweight stance and stock selection added value. A key theme we are looking to take advantage of is that the global supply of memory chips is now dominated by a few companies. However, the demand for these chips is increasing as the range of new technologies they are used in is becoming more diverse.

- One of the main beneficiaries of these trends that we hold in the portfolio is Taiwanese firm Taiwan Semiconductor Manufacturing Company (TSMC). Its shares outperformed, as the company gave an upbeat assessment of the outlook for the second half of this year and into 2020. In our view, TSMC is set to benefit from the accelerating adoption of 5G technology through demand for both smartphone and infrastructure chips.

Portfolio's Positioning In The Consumer Sectors Had Mixed Results

Overall, the portfolio is overweight to consumer-related stocks as we look to take advantage of the broad theme of growing wealth across emerging markets. Within this space, both the consumer staples and consumer discretionary sectors outperformed over the quarter, although our positioning in each had mixed results. Our overweight to the consumer staples sector had a positive impact, as did our choice of securities, although stock selection among consumer discretionary names hampered relative returns.

- One of our larger holdings in the consumer staples sector is Brazilian drugstore retailer Raia Drogasil, which outperformed on the back of results that were better than our expectations. They showed robust sales growth and market share gains. In our view, Raia Drogasil has built a drug retail platform that may be difficult for competitors to replicate. We believe that the company's strong brand and customer base are likely to help it continue to consolidate its share of the domestic market over time.
- Turning to the consumer discretionary space, Argentine stock MercadoLibre underperformed. The company operates the largest online trading platform in Latin America and saw its share price weaken in the politics-driven sell-off in the Argentine market. We continue to hold the stock. We believe MercadoLibre's strong market position and experience in e-commerce means it is well placed to capitalize on digital payments in an under-banked region. We expect the firm to become a leading digital provider of financial services in Latin America.

Our Overweight To The Financials Space Hampered Relative Returns

The portfolio is overweight to financials, where our highly detailed research has identified good investment potential across several countries, chiefly among banks and insurers. However, financials was among the weakest-performing sectors in emerging markets during the quarter, giving back ground after robust performance in the first half of the year. Our overweight stance weighed on relative returns, as did stock selection.

- One of our larger holdings in this sector is Hong Kong-listed life insurer AIA. In our view, the company is well positioned across the structurally growing markets of Southeast Asia, with a footprint that we believe would be difficult for competitors to replicate. However, the share price fell over the quarter as investor sentiment was hit by political turmoil in Hong Kong. On the positive side, the company reported results that showed strong growth in the value of new business and robust cash generation.

PORTFOLIO POSITIONING AND ACTIVITY

We retain a growth bias with a diversified portfolio of high-quality, well-run growth companies, emphasizing our highest-conviction ideas. In our view, many growth stocks in emerging markets look attractive in terms of free cash flow yields, even though valuation multiples may, in some cases, appear to be "optically" high. Our highly detailed investment research is helping us to find companies across a range of countries and sectors that are not dependent on the broader economic backdrop to grow their earnings and market share.

The portfolio remains overweight to financials, consumer, and information technology stocks, while we are underweight to sectors such as energy, materials, and utilities, where we generally do not see many companies with sufficient growth potential.

Financials

The portfolio is overweight to financials, by far the largest sector in emerging markets, where our focus is on finding companies that can grow independently of the broader economic environment. During the quarter, we made some changes to our holdings among Indian financials names.

- We topped up our position in HDFC Bank, which we view as India's highest-quality bank. The stock is a long-term outperformer but it is now back to historical average valuations; HDFC is a high-teens earnings compounder. Retail loans have slowed for a few quarters, mainly due to a deceleration in car sales and financing demand, as well as reduced credit appetite given the slower Indian economy. However, HDFC is "cautiously optimistic" that demand will bottom out and is guiding that its loan growth has troughed and may gradually recover from here.
- We eliminated our position in Axis Bank, an Indian private sector bank with significant market share in loans and deposits. Axis is better known as a corporate lender, but its incremental growth focus has shifted to retail lending in recent years, given slowing capital expenditure loan demand from large corporates. The company's latest earnings showed a reversal of asset quality improvements seen over the last few quarters, with slippages and credit costs picking back up. Given soft domestic economic conditions, we believe re-rating expectations will reset lower in the near term.

Consumer Staples

In our view, increasing prosperity across the emerging world is providing a favorable medium- to long-term backdrop for consumer-related companies. We have identified several good opportunities in the consumer staples space, where we have a large overweight. During the quarter, we initiated a position in a beverages company and topped up our holding in a brewer.

- We added to our holding in Anheuser-Busch InBev (ABI), the world's largest beer company. In our view, the initial public offering of its Australian business reduces concerns around leverage, and we are also increasingly bullish that ABI's Brazil operation is bottoming and may pick up meaningfully from here.
- We initiated a position in Ambev, a beer and soft-drinks company with exposure to Brazil and the rest of Latin America. As mentioned above with regard to ABI, we are increasingly confident that Ambev's Brazil business may meaningfully improve from here and added the name to the portfolio as a result.

Consumer Discretionary

We are also looking to take advantage of the theme of growing wealth in the developing world through our holdings in the consumer discretionary space. While the portfolio is marginally underweight here, we have a sizable position in absolute terms; our highly detailed research has helped us to identify several stock-specific opportunities in this area of the market. During the quarter, we trimmed one of our positions, while a corporate action at one of our holdings led to other stock weighting changes.

- We reduced our position in Lojas Renner, the second-largest apparel store chain in Brazil. The company operates stores that offer apparel and footwear for adults and children through several private-label brands. We continue to like the name but trimmed our holding following strong outperformance in order to manage position size.
- Naspers is an NAV-driven stock in South Africa that trades at a sizable discount to listed assets (it has significant stakes in internet names Tencent and Mail.ru) before any value attribution for its substantial food delivery, classified, fintech, and Nasper Ventures portfolios. Management has actively engaged in measures to address this NAV discount over the last few years, culminating in the listing of a pure consumer internet stock (named Prosus) in Amsterdam in September. As a consequence of this corporate action, the portfolio has a new position in Prosus.
- Our exposure to Naspers has reduced as a result of the new listing of some of its assets on the Netherlands stock exchange (see above paragraph on Prosus for more details).

Industrials And Business Services

Industrials and business services is one of the smaller sectors in emerging markets, and while we are underweight here, we have identified a few investment opportunities.

- One example is SM Investments, an investment holding company in the Philippines. The conglomerate has business interests in areas including shopping malls, retail operations, and banks. Given its focus on consumer-related businesses, we believe SM Investments offers a good level of exposure to the growth of the domestic economy.
- During the quarter, we eliminated our position in DP World, a leading global ports operator based in Dubai. The company operates terminals across the world and has a significant global market share. We sold out of the name due to its acquisition of Topaz Energy; we viewed this as one of several questionable acquisitions the company has made in maritime services. Although the stock is cheap, we believe it will remain so until management ends its acquisition plans.

Energy

The portfolio has a large underweight to energy. By and large, we do not see many companies in this area of the market with sufficient scope to grow, while we have a negative view on longer-term trends for the price of oil. However, partially as a counterbalance to our energy underweight, we have stock-specific positions in markets including Russia, the United Arab Emirates, and Saudi Arabia. These markets are correlated to oil, which we believe may help to shield the portfolio from relative downside in the event of any rallies in the price of oil.

MANAGER'S OUTLOOK

We believe that economic growth across many developing markets could continue to be higher than in the developed world, with some signs that this gap, which narrowed for five years through 2015, is turning wider. We feel that those countries that push forward with reforms could do well, while countries that do not may struggle. In our view, valuations are not as cheap as they were 12 months ago, but they remain at a slight discount relative to their history and to developed market peers. Our view is that we are likely to see a much more uneven world going forward, with less correlation and greater divergence in performance among countries and in stocks within those countries. We will remain focused on quality companies, as we continue to believe that those leading firms will weather the tough environment and may, in fact, improve their competitive positioning.

Near-term risks include an escalation of trade war rhetoric, a worse-than-expected slowdown in China or a breakdown in its financial system, or an unexpected bout of risk aversion due to geopolitical events. A stronger-than-expected U.S. dollar could also pose a risk for these markets. However, we believe that investor concerns may be overdone. The extent of the Chinese growth slowdown remains a key question, but we think policymakers have the tools to manage the transition and slowdown that is occurring in China.

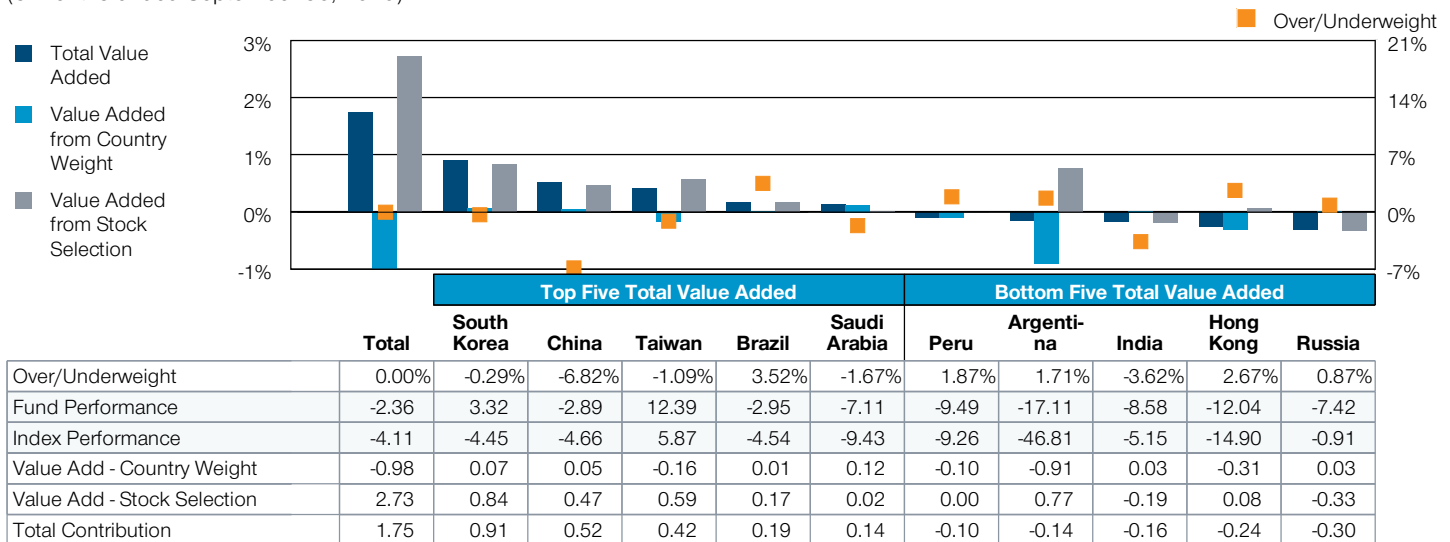

Speculation and expectations have shifted from further interest rate hikes from the U.S. Federal Reserve (Fed) to possible cuts, and as had been widely expected, U.S. rates were reduced in July and September. In our view, interest rate cuts by the Fed could be supportive for the emerging market asset class. Regardless, we believe most emerging market countries are in better shape today, with improved current account positions; higher foreign exchange reserves; higher real interest rates; and currencies that, in most cases, are well supported by these macro improvements.

Overall, we think the environment may remain complex, but in our view, this could provide a good opportunity for active investors to take advantage of valuation anomalies. We believe the emerging consumer remains a powerful force and could continue to drive strong growth in a variety of industries and companies, including retail, banking, technology, and the internet. With investors skeptical, valuations attractive, and fundamentals bottoming, we think the environment appears positive for emerging markets equities and ripe for stock picking.
